WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

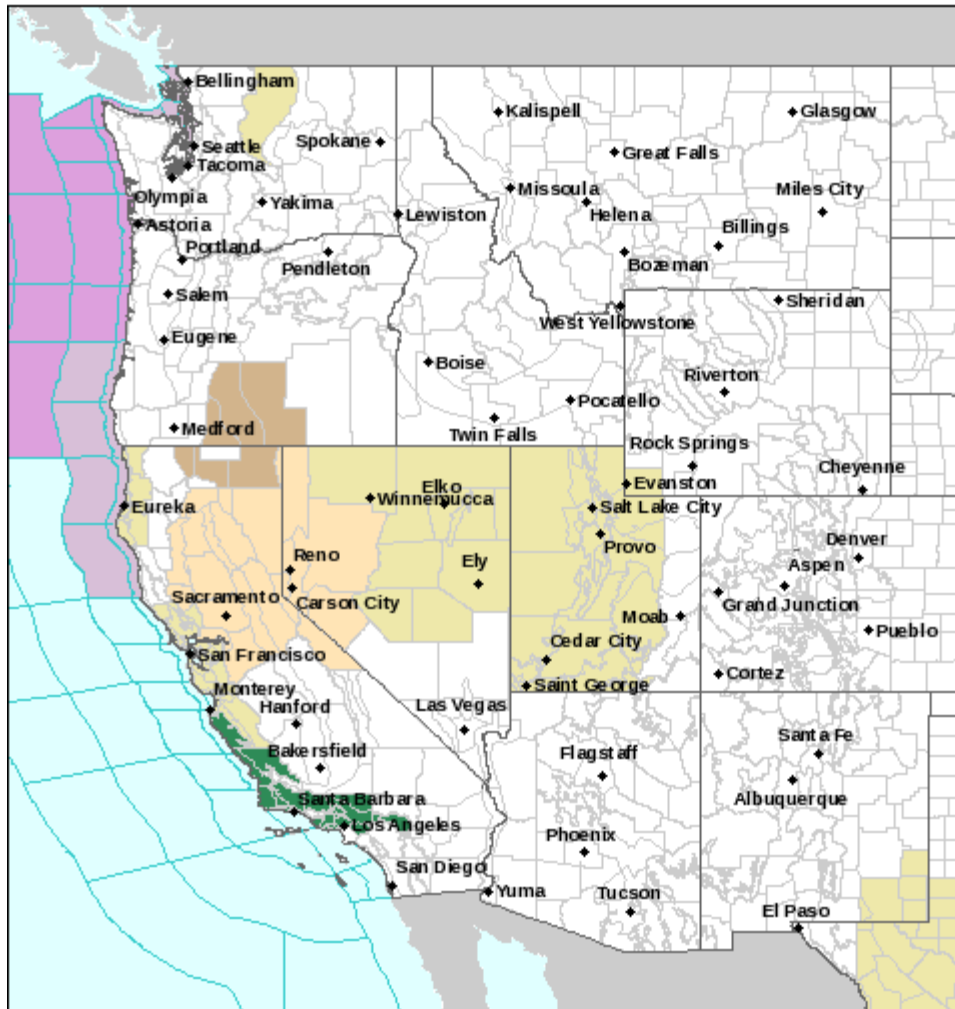

A large-scale low pressure trough will be over the west coast and eastern Pacific for the next two weeks and possibly beyond. Within the trough smaller-scale lows, fronts and disturbance will bring wet windy weather to the region at regular intervals. A front with gusty southerly winds and light to moderate rain will be nearly stationary over far northwest California today. The remainder of the region will be partly to mostly cloudy and breezy today. Southerly winds will gust to 20-30 mph in open areas, with some of the most wind-prone areas like Weed seeing afternoon gusts of 40-50 mph. The front will begin moving inland Thursday as another low pressure area approaches the central coast from the southwest. Scattered showers will spread into the region late Thursday through Friday. Another strong system will reach the north coast with rain and gusty south winds early Saturday and spread inland midday Saturday through Sunday. After a brief break Monday another low will reach the coast Tuesday. Snow levels will be 7000 feet or higher through Saturday then gradually drop beginning Sunday. Snow levels may be as low as 4000-5000 feet during the middle of next week.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

Mostly sunny and warmer weather can be expected today as weak high pressure continues to build into the area. But the warmer weather will be short-lived as a developing storm system is expected to bring widespread rain beginning Thursday. The storm is expected to weaken as it moves ashore Thursday afternoon, but copious moisture will allow this storm to bring significant wetting rains to most of the area. The rain will begin across the central coast by early afternoon before moving into the rest of Central California by late afternoon Thursday. Rain will slowly spread southeast into Southern California after sunset Thursday evening and will continue into the early morning hours Friday. At this time, 2-3" of rain looks probable across the south and southwest aspects of Central California with the heaviest rain occurring across coastal areas of Monterey and San Luis Obispo Counties. The south aspects of Santa Barbara and Ventura County may also see rainfall of 1-2" which will taper to 0.25" – 0.50" for areas south and east of Los Angeles County. Snow levels are expected to remain over 10,000 feet. Organized rainfall will end by noon Friday, but a few showers will be possible in the Sierras through Saturday morning. Drier and warmer weather will return Saturday afternoon. A colder storm system will quickly move into the area Sunday, leading to widespread rainfall across Monterey County and in the Sierras north of Fresno County. Strong west winds of 20-30 mph with gusts over 50 mph will be possible in the Sierras Sunday. Snow level may dip to 7,000 feet in Central California on Sunday. Light showers may occur over Southern California Sunday afternoon but additional wetting rains will be limited to central portions of the state. Warmer weather will return Monday. A third system may bring light rain to the far northern portion of the area Tuesday. No offshore winds are expected through the period.
